15. Type of Operation

We are seeking to improve the ways that doctors communicate with their patients when describing risks of anaesthetics. For instance, the risks of a severe headache after an epidural anaesthetic (one where a needle is inserted into the back to numb the spinal cord directly) can be communicated as an uncommon risk, or 1 in 100.

We are attempting to correlate words with numbers so we know how to communicate in an easy to understand way.

Do you have any questions?

33. would you prefer risks to be described in numbers or words?

34. How would you answer if the anaesthetist said, "There are risks attached to anything we do in hospital. Based on your history and examination, there is nothing I am particularly concerned about for you more than anybody else. We will do everything possible to make sure you are safe and comfortable when you wake up in the recovery room. Would you like to know any more about specific risks?"

Yes

No

35. If you answered 'yes', what more would you like to know?
